National Geographic journalists on their lunch breaks run into daily reminders of their singular place in science journalism.

A life-size spinosaurus, recently installed in the courtyard of its headquarters, stares at pedestrians

The magazine's subscription base is shrinking as few now bother to collect and stack old issues in their basements, and kids increasingly turn to their iPads for maps. Its domestic circulation totals about 4 million (international editions bring this up to 6.8 million), down from 10.8 million at its peak in 1989. It's still the eighth-largest magazine in the U.S., according to Alliance for Audited Media.

Fwd: Smart Phone

Tom:

I don't know if this is fraudulent or not but there was a problem with Android:

This past December, we reported that a popular Android app called Brightest Flashlight could do more than just shine light. Brightest Flashlight was a simple flashlight app that was highly-rated and had over 50 million installs. However, it had one devious, hidden feature: It would share personal data, such as your location, with advertisers. The FTC caught wind of this and began investigating the developer. According to GigaOm, the FTC reached a settlement with the developer last week, and it looks like he got away easy.

Erik Geidl, the single developer behind Brightest Flashlight, will have to stop collecting location data unless he clearly explains how and why he's doing so. He will also have to delete any location data he already has within 10 days of the settlement. And in the future, Geidl will have to keep records for the FTC to look at, and for the next ten years, Geidl will have to let the FTC know if he plans to start any new businesses.

As GigaOm points out, this is hardly a tough punishment for what is essentially "a stalking device disguised as a flashlight." Geidl did not receive a fine of any sort, nor does he have to give up any of the profits he made from selling users' data to advertisers.

Bill,

The info posted below has been circulating on the net for several months. However, to set the record strait, most all apps track info, personal data, usage, location and who knows what all else. Flashlight apps, of which there are many, seem to be notorious for cyber spying. In one sense, all apps spy on us, the only difference between one app and another is how much data they track and how malicious they are. Be sure that third party apps, those not from Apple certified developers, are not installed on your iPhone.

ps. Apple provides the perfect flashlight app in the "Control Center" and one needs not look for any other! You may pass along any of this info.

The screenshot shows the Whitepages Customer Support website. The header includes the Whitepages logo and "Customer Support". A navigation bar contains buttons for "FAQ", "Known Issues", "Contact", and "Give Feedback". A red box highlights the "Contact" button with the text "What about my privacy?". Below the navigation bar is a "Go Back" link and the "Data Policy" section, which states it was last updated on April 9, 2013. The main content area contains the following text: "This policy is designed to provide you with information regarding data collection and use in connection with our products and services. If you have questions about your profile, please click here." Below this is a section titled "A. INFORMATION WE COLLECT FROM YOU" with three numbered questions: "1. Why do we collect information?", "2. What kinds of information do you collect?", and "3. How do you use the information you collect?". The text under question 2 states: "We collect information that (i) you provide to us or authorize us to collect as a result of using our products (e.g. social media accounts, call and text logs, etc.) and (ii) information about your use of our products and services (e.g., browser type, search categories, location)." The text under question 3 states: "We use information to (i) provide useful products and services, such as Whitepages.com, Whitepages PRO, LOOKUP, caller ID applications, and customer". On the right side, there is a "Quick Find" sidebar with links for "FAQ", "Known Issues", "Other", "Whitepages", and "Whitepages Pro". Below this sidebar are links to "Remove your information" and "Are you a public official residing in California?". At the bottom right, there is a BBB Accredited Business logo with a rating of A+.
